

Good call:

why telemarketing is a potent ingredient in the marketing mix

New research by the DMA Contact Centres and Telemarketing Council has found that marketers continue to underestimate the effectiveness of telemarketing. With the vast majority of businesses surveyed – 92% – saying that it is effective, it is clear that telemarketing should be an essential element in B2C and B2B marketing campaigns.

Integration is the key, with 81% saying that they improved campaign performance when they combined telemarketing with another channel. Email is the most successful channel for integration for both B2C and B2B marketers but there were some interesting differences elsewhere and opportunities to think differently in the way businesses approach telemarketing in the future.

Think different: use content marketing to add value

Content marketing can help businesses build a relationship with the person on the other end and position you as an expert – an important part of consultative selling and lead nurturing.

The human touch: people want to connect with you

More than half of consumers prefer to speak to a real person when making a purchasing decision.

53% of consumers say it increases their trust in a brand when they speak to someone on the phone.

Conclusion

In an increasingly digital world it's clear the human touch still has a role to play. Whether B2C or B2B, H2H (human to human) can improve results as part of an integrated programme and has the ability to make customers feel valued.

The marriage of telemarketing and email remains the most effective combination. Yes, telemarketing requires greater investment than some channels but with ROI figures of between 500% to 1,100% it offers a return for every £1 spent – and that return will increase if it's combined with other marketing channels.

But businesses need to be more creative in how they use telemarketing – it can be used for more than just selling. Think beyond immediate sales or lead generation and consider incorporating other elements into your call, such as obtaining opt-in for further marketing contact.

Our digital lives mean alternative products and services are just a click away, but the human interaction of telemarketing can improve customer loyalty and trust when it's done right.
